A BRAVE LIEUTENANT.
A stirring incident, typifying the spirit of bravery and comradeship that has gone far to make the British Navy the pride of the world, was witnessed at Spithead on October 26. Half a gale of wind was blowing and a high sea was running, when a particularly big wave swept over Able-seaman Barnes, who was standing in a picket boat alongside his ship, the cruiser Antrim, and washed him into the sea. Barnes was thrown against the side of the picket boat and rendered insensible. He fell helplessly into the rough water and began to sink. Fortunately for the injured sailor the accident had been witnessed by Lieut. Frederick H. Hallows, first lieutenant of the Antrim. To that fast Barnes owes his life.

Without a moment's hesitation, and with all his clothes on, the young officer plunged headlong from the cruiser's side into the sea. The tide was rapidly carrying Barnes away from the ship, but in a few strokes Hallows had come up to the unconscious man and seized him.
The rescuer now devoted all his efforts to keeping Barnes' head above water. Meanwhile another lieutenant and a seaman inspector had also dived in, and, swimming to the spot, they assisted Lieut. Hallows to get Barnes safely into the boat, which was pulled to their aid.
Barnes, who was in a state of collapse, was taken to the hospital, H. M. S. "Hibernia," and he recovered after being attended by the doctor.

INSURANCE STORIES AND THE BUDGET.

Mr Stead's Latest.

In an article, which he contributes to the Fortnightly Review, Mr W. T. Stead gives some of his experiences in the Exploration of the Other World through Julia's Bureau. One of the results which Mr Stead claims is a definite warning spell out letter by letter that a certain lady well-known in English society would that week have an accident to her motor-car. It would be run down, and, therefore, she was urged to postpone motoring for a week. The message was given in the name of a man unknown to either of the sitters.

A typewritten warning was posted to the lady, but she had left home before it was delivered. At 6 o'clock the following night in that week, says Mr Stead, I received a telegram from the lady. She was in bed under medical treatment. The motor-car had been run down by a motor omnibus as she was passing through London.

Mr Stead asked Disraeli: Do you advise the Lords to throw out the Budget? Disraeli replied: The conflict in a way amuses me. As you know, I possessed, and still possess, a keen sense of humour, and I can well see the drift into which the present Government has placed the House of which I was an honourable member. My sympathies are with my class, although I have a profound contempt for the great mass of those with whom I worked in the flesh I would, as a matter of policy, advise them to pass the Budget, and then to take a General Election as soon as possible, so that the issue, unbiased by the question of the Lords, would be confined to what you are now calling Tariff Reform.

W. T. Stead, Tariff Reform, Tariff Reform, Mr Disraeli—Did you not say when you were alive that Protection was not only dead, but damned?

Disraeli: I did and it was true, but I am speaking not of truth, but of the policy for my party.

W. T. Stead: Can you see what is going to happen apart from what ought to happen? Lord—Is certain that the peers are going to throw the Budget out. Can you see anything about it?

Disraeli: I cannot give you any clear opinion on this matter, as I can only judge through the person I am attached to, but I am of opinion that at the long last the budget will be accepted. That is what I believe. Gladstone also concurs with my opinion.
